PREFACE.

PREFACE.

I.

The extant Exchequer accounts of the first nine years of the reign of James III., including those of the lands and burghs in the hands of the Queen Dowager, and of the lands of the King's brothers, then in pupillarity, form the contents of this volume. The time of audit was generally Midsummer, and the place either Edinburgh, Stirling, Perth, or Linlithgow. Some of the accounts of the Queen were audited at Falkland.

The whole accounts of the Crown lands during this period have been preserved, if we except the audit of the Queen's lands for the first term after the death of James II. The accounts of the custumars and bailies of the burghs are equally complete. Those of the Sheriffs are, all but two fragments relating to the sheriffdom of Linlithgow, which was in the Queen's hands, wholly wanting. We have also the charge side of an account of the Queen's Steward of 1463.

The authentic materials for the history of the reign of James III., if not quite so scanty as those available for the history of the preceding reign, are still somewhat meagre. We lose the guidance of the Asloan Chronicle in 1462, and of John Major in 1469. From the English chroniclers Hardyng and Wyrcestre and the Paston Letters we glean a few contemporary scraps of information on Scottish affairs, useful for fixing dates. The four writers to whom we are chiefly indebted for our knowledge of the events of this reign, namely Ferrerius, Lindsay of Pitscottie, Bishop Lesly, and Buchanan, all lived in the succeeding century. John Ferrerius, the Piedmontese monk of Kinloss, who takes up the thread of Bocce's narrative at the marriage of James III., is far more of a historian and less of a romancer than the writer whose work he continues. Lindsay of Pitscottie, whose picturesque style and graphic touches are always attractive, leaves out the occurrences of ten years; and he is throughout careless about chronology, as also is Buchanan. Lesly, if brief, is more to be relied on than the rest for the order of events. Drummond of Hawthornden, who flourished rather later than the four historians named, takes most of his facts from one or other of them; while they, on the other hand, are hardly ever found borrowing from each other.

The records of Parliament, the Rotuli Scotiæ, and the Register of the Great Seal, have enabled later historians to correct some of the errors and supply some of the deficiencies of their predecessors; and the recently published Treasurer's Accounts of 1473–4 contain valuable material for the same purpose, as pointed out in Mr Dickson's preface to them. The Exchequer accounts, which extend over the whole reign, while they give additional aid in illustrating and connecting the events of the period, contain also much that is important to the student of the political, commercial, social, and agricultural state of Scotland, and not a little information of interest to the genealogical antiquary. The following remarks touch chiefly on the bearing of the records in the present volume on general history.

II.

Various entries occur in this volume relating to the expedition to Roxburgh which cost James II. his life.[1] An intended visit to Mar to hunt at Kindrocht was postponed,[2] perhaps in consequence of the raid into England being resolved on; and mention occurs of expenses incurred by the King at Threave Castle on his way to Roxburgh.[3]

The accident which caused the King's death

[1] Certain silver articles are made and money lent to the King by his goldsmith "tempore exercitus versus Roxburgh" (page 292). Sixty pairs of "creillis" are sent to the host at Roxburgh by the occupiers of the Crown lands around Stirling (page 26). Twenty-four barrels for the siege of Roxburgh are sent to Hume Castle by the custumars of Haddington (page 30). Four and a half ells of purple silk velvet, at 10s. the ell, are bought to make the cloak in which King James rode on this fatal journey —page 35. The King's tailors, John and Thomas Hall, are allowed an extra fee for Martinmas 1470 "consideratis suis laboribus factis erga exercitum de Roxburgh, pro quibus nullum receperunt salarium" (page 290).

occurred on Sunday 3rd August 1460. A messenger was immediately despatched to the Queen, then resident at Edinburgh, who, with her son and certain Bishops and nobles, arrived at Kelso on the Friday following (8th August); and the young King, nine years old, was crowned in Kelso Abbey on Sunday 10th, when more than a hundred knights are said to have been made.[1] Some of the purchases for the coronation appear in the customs' account of Edinburgh at the next following audit.[2] The remains of the deceased King were then brought to Edinburgh and interred in the middle of the choir of Holyrood Chapel.[3] Entries regarding broad cloth, wax, and two ells of black cloth to cover the King's tomb, with fees of a carpenter and painter, appear in the Edinburgh account of March 1460–1;[4] and in a later account we find purchases of five ells of satin and twenty-one of buckram to ornament the King's tomb, the cost of painting the King's coat armorial and four other escutcheons, with wax and other items, amounting in all to £16, 18s. 10d.[5]

The King's death operated as a stimulus rather than a check to the army besieging Roxburgh. Not only was the siege brought to a successful termination, but the English fortress of Wark was also attacked, captured, and demolished. One of the entries at the first audit of the new reign relates to the bringing back of the artillery carts that had been at Wark to Edinburgh.[1]

The attack on Roxburgh had been undertaken in aid of Henry VI., whom the battle of Northampton (10th July 1460) had delivered into the hands of his enemies. Meantime the English Queen Margaret of Anjou, with her son, had escaped to Wales, and came from Wales to Scotland[2] in January following, when they were received and entertained by the widow of James II. at Lincluden Abbey. This visit lasted ten or twelve days,[3] during which three pipes of white wine of Poitou were drunk, and three bolls of salt (grossi salis) consumed.[4] In the schemes discussed between the two queens for the co-operation of the Scots with the cause of Henry, the restoration of Berwick was doubtless made a condition, as it had been before James' death; and it is said that a project was also discussed for a marriage between Prince Edward and the Princess Mary of Scotland.[5]

On returning to England, Margaret quickly assembled an army. The temporary triumph of her party at Wakefield, the slaughter of the Duke of York and his son Richard, and the reverses sustained by the Lancastrians at Mortimer's Cross, the second battle of St Albans, and Towton, are familiar incidents in English history. After the defeat of Towton (March 29, 1461) Queen Margaret and her husband seem to have made their way to Berwick, where, as had been prearranged, they brought about the surrender of that border town and its castle to the Scots.[1] The Royal party, including among others the Dukes of Somerset and Exeter, Lord Roos, and his son,[2] then made their way into Scotland.[3] The Paston Letters mention as a current report that the King remained at Kirkcudbright with four men and a boy, while the Queen and Prince went on to Edinburgh ;[4] but such does not appear to have been the fact. Preparations were made at once for the reception of the English King and Queen at Linlithgow Palace ;[5] and marts and muttons were supplied to them by the Steward of the Queen's household.[6] While Queen Margaret pledged a gold cup to the Scottish Queen Dowager,[7] we find 100 crowns (£50) given, either as a loan or a present, to the English Queen.[8] From Linlithgow the distinguished fugitives proceeded to Edinburgh, taking up their residence in the Convent of the Dominican Friars,[9] a provision of four marts with hides, twenty-one carcases of marts, and fifty sheep, for the expenses of the King of England appearing of this date in the account of the custumars of Edinburgh.[1] Among the writs of the city of Edinburgh is a charter by Henry VI. of date 2nd January 1463–4, in which, in consideration of the honourable reception accorded to himself, his Queen, and his son, during their stay in Edinburgh, he gives permission to the community of Edinburgh to trade in England on payment of no higher dues than are paid by the citizens of London.[2] The young prince spent part of his time at Falkland with the Scottish Queen Dowager, the length of sojourn there being on one occasion specified as thirteen days;[3] and the whole stay of the royal party in Scotland seems to have exceeded a year.

There is apparently no extant account of the exact date or particulars of the surrender of Berwick. In one of the Paston Letters, written in May 1461, Berwick is said to be full of Scots, and a battle with the Scots is considered imminent.[4] The Haddington customs' account, rendered in July 1462, and going back to March 1460–1, contains an entry that may perhaps be connected with the handing over of Berwick to the Scots, an item of £3, 0s. 2d. as expenses of the Keeper of the Privy Seal and other household servants of the King and Queen at Haddington, when the Queen rode to Coldingham to confer with certain Englishmen, the same accountants crediting themselves at the same time with outlays of various descriptions on Berwick Castle at the time of its recovery, namely, the purchase and direct carriage to Berwick of a quantity of salt, and the carriage of oatmeal, bombards, and artillery, also destined for Berwick, to the port of Belhaven, with expenses connected with the boats of Berwick Castle.[1] The newly acquired fortress was at once put under the charge of Robert Lauder of Edrington, whose salary for a full year as keeper of Berwick Castle appears in the Edinburgh customs' accounts of the same date.[2] In the contemporary account of the earldom of March occurs a charge of £6, 5s. for bringing the Queen's bombard from Berwick to Trinity College;[3] and in the following year the receiver of the rents of March makes mention of a further sum of £15, 6s. due to him for carriages to Berwick at the time of its recovery.[4]

The recovery of Berwick was almost immediately followed by an unsuccessful attempt to acquire Carlisle. That border town, which was held for Edward IV., was laid siege to by a Scottish army; but the siege, in which the Scots are said to have lost six thousand men, was raised by Lord Montagu, events alluded to in a letter which cannot have been written later than May 1461.[5]

It does not appear that any council of regency was appointed to carry on the Government during the tender age of the young sovereign. Of the first Parliament of James III., held at Edinburgh 23rd February 1460–1,[1] of which the record has not been preserved, there is a brief notice in the Asloan MS. To that Parliament, says the Chronicler, "come thir lordis under writtin, that is to say the Lord of Ylis and Erll of Ros, and all the lardis of the Ilis, Lord Dernlie, and the Lord Kalendar, the Lord Hammiltoun. And thai did litill gud in the forsaid Parliament, but that thai ordanit sessionis to sit, first at Aberdene, syne in Perth, syne in Edinburgh. And thai left the king in keping with his moder the quene, and governyng of all the kinrik. And therfor the lordis said that thai war littil gud worth, bath spirituale and temporall, that gaf the keping of the kinrik till a woman."[2]

That the Lord of the Isles, whose name stands first among those present at this Parliament, had a very special summons to attend, appears from mention made in the Moray account audited 6th March 1460–1 (when this very Parliament was sitting) of Marchmont Herald and a macer having been sent on a special mission to Ross to summon him to Parliament, and a notary having been brought from Elgin to Rosemarky to attest the summons.[3] A citation of this very formal kind was obviously not the ordinary precept to attend Parliament which was received alike by every Earl or other Baron and every Commissioner of the burghs; and there can be little doubt that though the island Lord had stood by James II. at Roxburgh, his more recent acts were looked on with suspicion, and that it was as an accused party that he was summoned to appear. In the immediately preceding passage in the same Moray account it is averred that he had appropriated to himself the entire fermes of Petty, Brachly, Strathdearn, Leffare, Ardmannoch, Strathnairn, and Kilmyles, due at last Martinmas term, amounting to £206, 6s. 5½d., besides the rents of other lands occupied by the Thane of Cawdor. There had been serious disturbances in the Western Islands in which he may have been believed to have had a hand, and rumours may even have transpired of his traffickings with England. If the chronicler whom we have quoted is correct in asserting that the island Lord was present at this Parliament, the inference is that, inasmuch as his plans were not yet ripe for action, and it might have been found difficult to obtain proof of his guilt, he deemed it his wisest course to obey the summons, but to bring with him a large retinue, whence perhaps the mention of "all the lairds of the Isles."

In April 1462 the English Queen took her departure from Scotland by sea for Bretagne. Her subsequent acts of that year, including the aid given to her by Louis XI., and her capture of Bamborough and Dunstanborough, repulse from Alnwick, and escape to Berwick, do not call for detailed notice here. In the meantime, the Earl of Warwick, who, according to the Paston Letters, had taken a castle of the Scots,[1] opened negotiations with the Scottish Queen. According to Wyrcestre[2] they had a meeting at Dumfries in April, when the terms were discussed of a treaty which was to include the marriage of the Queen herself to Edward IV.; and an entry in the rolls of correspondent date indicates the removal from Stirling to Dumfries of the arras hangings which usually accompanied the Court from place to place.[3] The Paston Letters assert that Warwick, Essex, Lord Wenlock, the Bishop of Durham, and others, had, in or before July, an interview with the Scottish Queen at Carlisle.[4] On 2nd August Edward appointed Warwick his ambassador, with power to treat with the ambassadors of the King of Scots;[5] on 14th September a safe conduct was granted to the Bishop of Aberdeen, the Earl of Orkney, Lords Livingston, Hamilton, and Borthwick, the Keeper of the Privy Seal, the laird of Dundas, and Sir Alexander Napier, as Scottish ambassadors, to pass into England;[6] and on 5th November Sir Robert Ogle had a commission as ambassador to negotiate for a truce with James's ambassadors.[1] The rolls of correspondent date make mention of Windsor herald of the King of England being in Edinburgh,[2] of an ambassador from England, designed the "magister de Boltoune,"[3] and of a sum of £200 paid of the Chancellor of England.[4]

The English King was, however, playing a double part; for his influence was at the same time being used to induce the Earl of Ross and other island chiefs to revolt. On 22nd June 1462 the banished Earl of Douglas, Sir William Wells, Sir John Douglas of Balveny, and others, were empowered as ambassadors from Edward IV. to treat with the Earl of Ross;[5] and on 19th October Edward promised protection to all Scots who would join the Earl of Douglas against their country.[6] Of the same date the Lord of the Isles, in a manifesto dated from his castle of Ardtornish in which he assumed the style of a sovereign prince, authorised his ambassadors to confer with the ambassadors of the King of England;[7] and an interview which took place at Westminster resulted in a rather remarkable treaty, of date 17th March 1462–3, stipulating inter alia for a conquest of Scotland, to be effected by the combined forces of the island Lord and the Earl of Douglas, and for a partition of the conquered realm between the two Earls and Donald Balloch, who were to acknowledge themselves vassals of England, bound to assist Edward in his wars.[1]

These English ambassadors were the Bishop of Durham, the Earl of Worcester, and Lord Wenlock, the same whom the Paston Letters specify as having a meeting with the Scottish Queen Dowager. Henry VI. was at the same time, by a like formal instrument, inducing the Earl of Angus (the head of the old party among the Scottish nobles) by the promise of an English dukedom, to assist him in the recovery of his dominions.

The rebellion thus planned broke out almost before the date of this treaty, headed by a natural son of the Earl of Ross, and the same Donald Balloch whose depredations had caused trouble to the Crown in the preceding reign. The island Lord, still in the style of a sovereign, issued proclamations to the inhabitants of the sheriffdoms and burghs of Inverness and Nairn, enjoining them to obey his son Angus as his lieutenant, directing that the Crown rents and customs should be paid to himself, and authorising punishment to be inflicted on the refractory. In the proceedings taken against him twelve years later he is said to have further laid siege to Rothesay Castle, and plundered the islands of Bute and Arran, putting to death many of the inhabitants,[2] acts generally assumed to have been committed at this time, but of which we find no trace in the contemporary Exchequer accounts, including those of Bute.[3]

[1] Rotuli Scotiæ, ii. p. 406.

[2] Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, ii. p. 109.

[3] The allusion is perhaps to Donald Balloch's raid of 1453. In noticing that outbreak in the preface to vol. v. p. cvii., the editor omitted to advert to the incidental allusion to the capture of Brodick Castle in the Bute account of that year (ibid. page 578, l. 4.), which puts beyond doubt the accuracy of the chronology which he has adopted.

Boece has a story, which has been repeated on his authority by later writers, of an attack on the Castle of Blair, and the dragging the Earl of Athole (uncle of the King), and his Countess the quondam "Fair Maid of Galloway" from the sanctuary to which they had fled to the Western Islands, an act of sacrilege followed by such unequivocal manifestations of Divine vengeance on land and sea, that the rebels were at last fain to restore the Earl and Countess, and perform penance with the deepest humility at the shrine which they had violated. We have discovered no corroboration of these incidents in the Exchequer rolls, any more than in the proceedings against the Lord of the Isles in 1475.

The rebellion of 1463 was of brief duration. There is no trace of any active participation of the Earl of Douglas in it; nor did the Scottish Government, until a later period, obtain full knowledge of Ross's treasonable dealings with Edward IV. According to the Asloan Chronicle, the Lord of the Isles was summoned to Parliament "under the pane of forfalt and comperit nocht. And than thai supersedit his caus quhill" (till) "the feist of Sanct Jhon the Baptist, and continewit the forsaid Parliament till that day to be haldin at Aberdene."[1] Neither of this Parliament, nor of its adjourned meeting at Aberdeen on St John the Baptist's Day 1463, have any records been preserved.[1] But at the following Exchequer audit, that of August 1463, the expenses, £12, 10s. 4d., are allowed of the Earls of Argyle, Lords Montgomery and Kennedy, and Treasurer Guthry, sojourning two days at Perth on their way north on a mission ("in ambassiata") to the Earl of Ross.[2] And in the customs' account of Inverness embracing the period of the rebellion, in which a balance of £74, 12s. 3d. is shown in favour of the Crown, it is averred that that sum and more has been taken from the custumars at his own hand by the Lord of the Isles, as admitted by him before the Lords of Council at Inverness by letters now in the hands of the Clerk Register, "quarum sigillum in medio ruptum est."[3] The already mentioned complaints made at the first audit of the reign of the retention of the fermes of the Crown lands in the north by the Lord of the Isles, Sheriff of Inverness, had been renewed at the audit of July 1462;[4] and the following year, Sir Alexander Dunbar, Chamberlain of Moray, in his account ranging from July 1462 to Martinmas 1463 reports that £542, 5s. 7d. of the fermes of Petty, Leffare, Bonnach, Ardmannoch, the vacant see of Moray, &c., had been appropriated by the Earl of Ross and his brother Celestine, wrongfully and without the King's warrant.[5] The "incendium

comitis de Roos" is in the following year adduced in explanation of the fact that large tracts of land near Inverness had ceased to yield any rent.[1]

Still no active steps seem to have been taken against this powerful disturber of the peace. If he did not personally come to Parliament, he was represented by a procurator at the Parliament of 1464, as well as at those of 1467 and 1471;[2] and in the Inverness account of 1467 he is allowed to retain the fermes of that burgh, of which he had illegally taken possession the year immediately following the death of James II.[3]

Mary of Gueldres had, by grant of 1445 confirmed in Parliament, obtained a conjunct liferent in certain of the Crown lands, in security of her provision of 10,000 crowns or £5000.[4] In further security—or supersession—of this grant, a second charter of 1451, which was followed by a like Parliamentary ratification, gave her a similar right to certain lands not altogether the same, with the fermes and customs of five of the burghs.[5]

Though the Crown accounts, at the first Exchequer of the reign, held in March 1460–1, expressly exclude the lands covered by the Queen's joint infeftment,[1] there was at first no separation between the households or officers of State of the King and Queen. The separation was effected some time between this audit and July 1462,[2] when it was settled by the King's Council, or in Parliament, that "the King suld ay remane with the Quene, but scho suld nocht intromit with his profettis, but allenarlie with his person."[3]

Imperfect as are our sources of information regarding the internal politics of this period, so much is clear, that there were then two parties among the Scottish nobles, the old Lords, with Angus at their head, who looked chiefly to strengthening their own order at the expense of the Crown, and the young, who aimed at supporting the authority of the Queen, with the wise and patriotic Bishop Kennedy as her counsellor.[4] It was probably by Bishop Kennedy's advice that the Queen, immediately on assuming the government, made various changes in the officers of State and keepers of the principal fortresses.[5] Lord Avondale was made Chancellor in place of Bishop Schoriswod of Brechin. To James Lindsay, Provost of Lincluden, who had been Keeper of the Privy Seal since 1452, that office was confirmed; and although during the lifetime of the Queen, he appears principally in the rolls as her minister and counsellor, the Privy Seal continued in his custody until 1468, shortly before his death, when he was made Treasurer. The author of the Asloan MS. speaks unfavourably of him,[1] but his estimate of his character must be received cum nota, in consideration of the pronounced sympathies of that chronicler with the old Lords.[1] The name of another churchman and confidential servant of the Queen Dowager, Henry Kinghorn, Steward of her household, is of frequent occurrence. After the separation of the King's and Queen's households, there was an officer called the Queen's "placitor" or legal adviser,[2] and Master Gilbert Hering is on one occasion designed "advocatus domine regine."[3]

We have in 1461 and 1462 separately audited rolls of the "ballivi" of the Queen's lands, these including exactly those conveyed in 1451, namely, the Crown property adjoining Linlithgow and Stirling, Menteith, Methven, Strathern, Kinclevin, Fife, March, Mar, Garioch, and Brechin. The accounts show that, in accordance with that grant of 1451, she also received an annuity of £100 from the customs of Aberdeen, the "officium vicecomitis" (that is the Crown revenue from) the sheriffdom of Linlithgow, and the fermes and customs of the burghs of Perth, Stirling, Linlithgow, Inverkeithing, Kinghorn, and Cupar, to which in the accounts is added Crail, there expressly stated to be included in the Queen's joint infeftment,[1] although unmentioned in the recorded charter. Computing from the data furnished by the Exchequer accounts, the Queen's income from these sources would quite amount to the £5000 secured to her.

Building operations figure largely in the credit side of the Queen's accounts. Repairs and alterations were going on at Stirling Castle,[2] and still more at Falkland, in connection with which there are various details about a new chamber constructed for the Queen, with glass windows, and an ambry (armoriole). Friar Andrew Lisouris, a lay brother of Cupar-Fife, who as King's carpenter is prominent in the accounts of this and the preceding reign, was, with other members of the same craft, at work for eighty days fitting up this apartment. Andirons are provided for it, a "viridarium" or lawn is laid out in front of it, and a door is made to communicate between the chamber and the lawn. There were also repairs going on in the eastern part of the palace called "le counthouse." The great hall got a new fireplace; a lock for the wardrobe, and a key for the great chamber door occur among the other items; and there was a new stable costing £16, 2s. 7d., and a new coalhouse.[3]

[1] Page 303. While Crail is certainly not in the record (Reg. Mag. Sig. iv. 224), which the editor has carefully examined, there seems reason to suspect that it had been in the original charter, and was left out by a slip of the transcriber.

But the most extensive works carried on by the Queen, to which a large share of her income was devoted, were connected with the Castle of Ravenscraig, and the collegiate church of Trinity near Edinburgh.

It was probably James II. who conceived the design of placing a royal Castle on the cliff that protrudes into the Firth of Forth near Dysart. On 8th March 1459–60, five months before that King's death, the lands of Dysart, specified as Wilstoune, Carbarry, and Dubbo, and of which this rocky promontory formed part, were resigned in the Queen's favour by Walter Ramsay and Janet his wife, who held them as vassals of the earldom of Fife, they getting in exchange Crounerland, Manuelrig (the colliery excepted), and Gilleisland near Linlithgow.[1] The building operations, begun at the very commencement of Mary's widowhood, were carried on with great vigour under the direction of Master David Boys, as master of works. In the accounts of the Queen's lands and fermes for 1462 and 1463, Boys receives for this building sums amounting together to £600.[2] Other entries tell us of the bringing, in the year 1461, of fourteen great timbers called "joists" from the woods on the banks of the Allan to Stirling at a cost of 7s., of Andrew Balfour (elsewhere met with as clerk of the King's Wardrobe), getting £2, 10s. for cutting and planing them and transporting them to Ravenscraig, six more joists remaining in the wood in charge of said Andrew.[1] We have a large supply of oats from Fife for horses transporting building stones to Ravenscraig.[2] The already mentioned Lesouris is repaid £10, 4s. for his purchase of "joists" and boards for the same building.[3] Two cart wheels, price £1, 4s. 6d., are sent from Cupar to Ravenscraig,[4] and a boat is hired to convey timber from Menteith to the works there.[5] The custumars of Perth send two joists and two "rudis" of timber, costing £18, 2s. 4d., to Ravenscraig and Trinity College, and pay 5s. 9d. for their carriage.[6] In 1461 the buildings were so far advanced that Kinghorn, the Queen's Steward, spends twenty-five days there, along with other servants (familiarii) of the Queen;[7] and Robert Liddale (encountered in the previous reign in the various characters of keeper of Tantallon Castle, King's tailor, constable of Dunbar Castle, ranger of Yarrow, and bailie of the earldom of March) receives £23, 6s. 8d. for his expenditure while residing at Ravenscraig.[8] Whether or not the Castle was completed under Mary of Gueldres does not appear, but the payments for it cease at her death.[1]

In the Linlithgow accounts of 1466, 1468, and 1469, Crounareland is said to have been granted to Archibald Ramsay (the successor of Walter), in exchange for Ravenscraig (pages 404, 536, 629). The same family of Ramsays are afterwards designed from the lands of Dunnone in Forfarshire owned by them.—Reg. Mag. Sig. xiii. 74, 140; xiv. 457 (14 June 1493, 14 June 1434, and 16 Nov. 1507).

Still more interest attaches to Trinity College, in which, as in Ravenscraig, the Queen was carrying out a scheme projected by her husband. In it a foundation for a provost, eight prebendaries, and two choristers, was combined with a hospital for the maintenance of thirteen poor persons. A papal bull of 23rd October 1460, authorised the annexation to the new foundation of the hospital of Soltre (Soutra), which had been for some time held in commendam by the Cathedral of St Andrews as the benefice of the Chancellor; and this annexation was further confirmed by two Bulls of 1462.[2]

The earliest entry in the Exchequer Rolls relating to the new foundation is a payment of 15s. in the year 1461, to Master Gilbert Heryng, "advocato domine regine," for making a journey from Edinburgh to Falkland "pro placito de Soltre."[3] A

[1] In 1464 there begins a series of accounts of custumars of salt of Dysart and Ravenscraig. A few years later, when William Earl of Orkney and Caithness, the magnificent founder of the collegiate church at Rosslyn, surrendered under compulsion his earldom of Orkney to the Crown, Dysart, Ravenscraig, and the adjoining lands were granted to him as a small compensation for that princely possession, by charter dated 17th September 1470 (Reg. Mag. Sig. vii. 159), which reserved to the Crown the free port of Ravenscraig. In 1471, the first year after this transfer, the customs' account of the "locus" of Ravenscraig is combined with that of the "burgus" of Crail; and one of the items in its discharge side is a payment for the expenses of Robert Sibbald, confined in the dungeon of Ravenscraig for thirteen weeks previously to the justice-ayre at Cupar.—Vol. viii. page 138.

churchman named Richard Robertson, whose name is of frequent occurrence in connection with the Exchequer audits, has also in the same account a payment made to him for his exertions "penes causam de Soltre."[1] The Queen visited St Andrews in Lent of 1461, probably in pursuance of the same object, when she paid 20s. of drink-silver to the masons of Bishop Kennedy's College of St Salvator, then being built, and made an offering of 10s. in the cathedral; and the sailors of the Bishop's ship (probably the "navim immanem et fortissimam" mentioned by Major[2]), were paid £4, 14s. 6d. for the freight of shale roofing either for Trinity College or for Ravens-craig.[3] At the same and succeeding audit of the Queen's accounts large payments occur, sometimes to John Halkerston, the architect of the Queen's College, whose memory has been preserved in the name of Halkerston's Wynd borne by the steep declivity which led from the High Street to Trinity church, and sometimes to Edward Bonkill, the Queen's confessor, who became the first Provost of the new foundation.[4] The whole amount thus

[4] While in the accounts of 1462 the new foundation is simply called "collegium domine regine," it is to be noted that in those of 1463, most of the payments are said to be for the "collegium Sancti Salvatoris," and in only one instance is the college called "Sancte Trinitatis." There is in itself no improbability in the Queen being a contributor to a limited extent to Bishop Kennedy's foundation of St Salvator at St Andrews. If she had, as has been asserted, committed faults only to be atoned for by special fasting, confession, and almsgiving, she might have availed herself of the letter of indulgence of Pius II. to all who visit the new foundation and contribute to its disbursed by Mary of Gueldres approached £1100.[1] The works were carried on by James III., after the death of the Queen, and probably arrested at his death, when only the choir and transept were completed. In the diptych which formed the altar-piece, now at Holyrood, an interesting picture of the school of Vaneyck, likenesses have been preserved of the royal foundress and of Provost Bonkill.[2]

Mary of Gueldres survived her husband little more than three years, dying towards the end of 1463, when her age could hardly have exceeded thirty. The exact date usually given is the 16th of November of that year, in connection with which it is noteworthy that, in an account in this volume dated 21st June 1466, Kirkandris is said to have been in the King's hands from the time of the late Queen, "qui erat die primo Decembris anno sexagesimo quarto."[3] But that "sexagesimo quarto" is a slip for "sexagesimo tercio" appears from the accountant immediately debiting himself with the fermes of Kirkandris "post obitum regine, que sunt quinque termini"; and the Queen is alluded to as dead, and there are entries regarding endowment (Theiner's Vetera Monumenta, pp. 428, 429). But the mention of Bonkill and Halkerston as the recipients of the money seem to put its destination beyond doubt; though, as the Bull of 1460 shows that the church was from the first intended to be dedicated to the Holy Trinity, and Robertson, whose connection with the annexation of Soltre has been adverted to, was also writer of the rolls, it is not easy to understand how the slip has arisen.

her funeral in the accounts rendered in July 1464.[1] It thus seems more probable that the 1st December, the day of the month here given, was the real date, than the 16th November, which, so far as the editor is aware, is specified by no more nearly contemporary writer than Bishop Lesly. That Edinburgh was the place of her death, and that she was buried in the church which she founded, are facts resting on contemporary evidence and not admitting of doubt, though the rolls contain a payment for lights, painted escutcheons, and fees of servants in connection with funeral obsequies of the Queen in Brechin Cathedral.[2] A payment of £111, 15s. 8d. to the late Queen's Steward is said to be partly for her obsequies and interment,[3] and there is a further payment of £16, 7s. 6d. to the same Steward in the Edinburgh customs' account for wax for her funeral.[4]

The collapse of the insurrection of the Lord of the Isles seems to have brought about a serious wish on the part of Edward IV. to be on an amicable footing with Scotland. The truce between the countries was ratified on 9th December 1463, and extended on 3rd June 1464 to a period of fifteen years. Commissioners were appointed to deal with infringements of it, the most flagrant of which had been the capture at sea on his way to Guelderland of the young Duke of Albany, brother of the King, travelling under the safeguard of a passport from King Edward. Propositions were discussed both for a permanent peace and for a marriage between the Scottish King and a subject of England (20th June 1465): and on 1st June 1466 a further prolongation of the truce was agreed on for fifty-four years, namely, to 31st October 1519.[1] The rolls contain references to the various embassies to England;[2] and the account of the Earldom of March alludes to the expected arrival at Dunbar Castle of the Duke of Albany with certain foreigners in his company.[3]

In the month of July 1465,[4] while these negotiations were going on, the King and people of Scotland sustained a severe bereavement in the death of the Bishop of St Andrews, a prelate who seems to have belonged to the very highest type of mediæval churchmen. The potent influence in the State which Bishop Kennedy possessed, in virtue at once of his talents, his disinterested integrity, and his near relationship to the royal house, had been largely used to curb the elements of discord that were so rife in the country, and to prevent the young sovereign from being made the tool of faction. The removal of this restraining power left James, now in his fourteenth year, a prey to the intrigues of any of those nobles more immediately about him who might make a bold stroke to get possession of his person.

[4] The commonly accepted date of Bishop Kennedy's death—May 10, 1466—has been shown by Mr Dickson (Preface to Treasurer's Accounts of Scotland, vol. i. p. xl.), to be erroneous, inasmuch as it appears, from a notarial protest of 18th July 1465, in the "Registrum Nigrum de Aberbrothok," that the see was then vacant. He must, however, have died very shortly before that date, as the accounts in this volume indicate that he was sitting as an auditor of Exchequer on June 21 1465 (page 302), and further allude to him as alive on June 28 and July 2 of the same year (pp. 326, 333).

Three of the intimates of the King were Lord Fleming, Lord Kennedy, and Sir Alexander Boyd.

Robert Fleming, son of the Malcolm Fleming who was beheaded in Edinburgh Castle along with the sixth Earl of Douglas in 1440, had, when James II. reached mature years, been received into favour, made Steward of his household, and had the dignity of a Lord of Parliament conferred on him.[1]

Lord Kennedy, the King's near relative, whose family influence was great in the west of Scotland, figures in the Exchequer accounts as Chamberlain of the Earldom of Carrick, and sometimes also of the Crown lands near Stirling. He had shortly before his brother's death been made keeper of Stirling Castle, but we look in vain in his actings for the high principled integrity of the prelate.

Sir Alexander Boyd, famed for his proficiency in all knightly accomplishments, was the King's instructor in military exercises. He had, in 1463 or 1464, been made governor of Edinburgh Castle,[2] and was married to a Kennedy.[1] His elder brother, Robert Boyd of Kilmarnock, representative of a family of good position in the west of Scotland, had been made a Lord of Parliament by James II.,[2] and employed by him in important public embassies.

On 10th February 1465–6 these three nobles, who might have else been a check on each other, entered into a coalition by a yet extant indenture[3] to stand by one another in all causes and quarrels. The parties to this bond each enumerate certain persons—including some of the principal magnates in Scotland—with whom they had already entered into similar indentures; Fleming becomes bound not to remove the King out of the keeping of Kennedy and Boyd, and, as a quid pro quo, he is to have such wards, reliefs, and marriages as should fall to the Crown in preference to, and on more reasonable terms than, any one else.

By this means was the way paved for the sudden and shortlived elevation of the Boyds to virtually supreme authority. The Exchequer audit of 1446 began at Linlithgow on the 9th June, the King being present, and the auditors, besides the Chancellor, the Earl of Argyll, and other officers of State, including Lord Kennedy and Sir Alexander Boyd.[1] The Exchequer had approached a close on July 9th, the day on which—according to the short narrative contained in Act of Attainder of 1469—the seizure of the King took place.[2] The records of next Parliament show that Lord Somerville and the eldest sons of Lord Hailes and of Ker of Cessford had been active participants in this transaction, of which we have no very trustworthy account. Neither Ferrerius, Lindsay of Pitscottie, nor Lesly describe it: but, according to Buchanan, the King was led away from the Exchequer on the pretext of a hunting party, and Lord Kennedy, being one of those in his company, beginning to suspect treachery, attempted a rescue, but was overborne by a blow dealt at him by Sir Alexander Boyd. We now know that Kennedy was himself a party to the scheme: but that he made a feint of opposition, and submitted to a brief imprisonment in the Castle of Stirling for appearance sake, is rendered probable by two incidental allusions in the accounts of the following year to ale that was brewed and drunk in Stirling Castle, at the time of, or immediately after, the arrest of Gilbert Lord Kennedy.[3]

[1] In the Stewarton accounts of 1471 and following years, an annuity is paid to Janet Kennedy, widow of Sir Alexander Boyd (vol. viii. page 53).

[2] He is called Robert Boyd of Kilmarnock in the Exchequer accounts of 1451 (vol. v. page 453), and on 18th July 1454 sat in Parliament as Lord Boyd.—Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, Suppt., p. 23.

The King was conveyed to Edinburgh Castle, of which, as already stated, Sir Alexander Boyd was keeper; and a Parliament was convened at Edinburgh on 9th October. As Parliaments held at Edinburgh met in those days within the Castle, it can hardly be doubted that the governor of that fortress could exercise considerable control and influence over their proceedings. After the discussion of certain topics of national interest, including the marriages of the King and of his brother and sister, the "annual of Norway," and the bringing to justice persons holding castles against the King and Duke of Albany,[1] a premeditated scene was carried through with the view of securing the Boyds, as far as might be, in the enjoyment of their precarious exaltation. On the fifth day of the meeting of the Estates, Lord Boyd, entering the great hall of the Castle, knelt down before their Sovereign, humbly requesting the King to declare whether he, and those who had accompanied him, had incurred the royal displeasure for their proceedings of last July. James, in presence of the Estates, exonerated them from all blame, as they had acted by his royal command; and, as part of the same res gestæ Lord Boyd was constituted Governor of the person of the King and of his brothers, and of the fortresses of the kingdom.[2] For a further protection to the Boyds, these parliamentary proceedings were confirmed under the Great Seal in October following,[3] in which month another Parliament was held at Edinburgh, in the extant fragments of whose proceedings there is no reference to the Boyds. So paramount, however, had their influence become, that, four months later, the hand of the King's elder sister, the Princess Mary, was not thought too great a boon to bestow on Lord Boyd's eldest son. On 26th April 1467 the King, "in respect of his singular favour, regard, and love for his dearest sister Mary Countess of Arran, and in consideration of the obedience and services of Thomas Boyd Earl of Arran, her husband," granted simultaneously four charters to Thomas Boyd Earl of Arran and Mary his wife. The first gave him the Crown lands of Stewarton, Trarinyeane, and Turnberry, erected into a barony; the second conveyed to him Cavertoun in Roxburgh, Teling and Brichty in Forfarshire, and Polgavy in Perthshire, on his father's resignation. By the third charter he obtained the island of Arran, from which he was to take his title as Earl; and by the fourth he got the fee of the barony and castle of Kilmarnock and the other paternal Boyd estates, his father retaining the liferent.[1] While the Crown accounts of Stewarton cease, and mention is made of Arran as in possession of the Boyds,[2] the rolls further indicate that the relief and ward of Wardes and other lands in Aberdeenshire belonging to the late Sir William Lesly of Balquhain was granted to Thomas Earl of Arran and Robert Lord Boyd in payment of 1000 marks due as dower with the Princess, reference being made for further particulars to a no longer extant account of the Sheriff of Stirling.[1] The office of Great Chamberlain, vacant by the death of Lord Livingston, was conferred on Lord Boyd.[2]

The marriage of James III. and the downfall of the Boyds, are events beyond the period of the present volume.

IV.

While this volume contains, like its predecessors, much that is interesting to the student of family history, to which any detailed reference would hardly be in place in the Preface, the pedigree of the Earls of Douglas belongs so much to national history that the editor can hardly be regarded as wandering out of his province, if he here attempts to explain a series of entries regarding a Countess of Douglas, which will perplex the ordinary reader.

In connection with this explanation it must be

[1] Page 463.

[2] He is designed Chamberlain at the audit which opened 9th June 1468 (p. 520); and in the same year his daughter married Archibald fifth Earl of Angus, obtaining as dower the lands of Abernethy (Reg. Mag. Sig. vii. No. 38, 21st May 1468). The position of the family was further strengthened by a bond, dated Stirling 25th April 1468, to support Lord Boyd in his office of Governor of the King's person, the parties to which (besides Lord Boyd and the Earl of Arran) were the Bishops of Glasgow (Andrew Muirhead) and Aberdeen (Thomas Spens), the Earl of Argyll, James Lindsay, the keeper of the Privy Seal, and Archibald Whitelaw.—Boyd Papers.—Miscellany of Abbotsford Club, vol. i.

premised that, valuable as these records are for genealogical as well as other purposes, a certain allowance must always be made for the possibility of verbal slips on the part of the engrossing clerk. A clerical error in the present volume regarding the year in which Mary of Gueldres died has been already adverted to. Wide as was the latitude of orthography allowed in proper names, spellings are found from time to time which can only be accounted for by the limited local knowledge of the writer of the roll. A wrong Christian name occasionally occurs; and such a mistake, when it has once been made, has a tendency to recur, the clerk having before him, and being to a large extent guided by, the corresponding account of the preceding year. We have, for example, found Isabel Countess of Mar called Euphemia in 1456;[1] and in a passage in the present volume James Dunbar Earl of Moray is called Thomas,[2] a mistake which at one time led Mr Riddell to suppose that the wives of the second Lord Crichton and of Archibald Douglas were not sisters but cousins.[3]

In the discharge side of the account of the lordship of Brechin for 1465,[4] we find the rents of Pettintoscale, Petpullokis, and Tilquhilly, amounting to £33, 8s. 8d., paid, in virtue of a grant to continue till the King attained the age of fifteen, to a lady designed "Margareta Lyndesay comitissa de Douglas." In 1467 this entry is repeated, adding in connection with the king's age of fifteen "qui nunc completur."[1] In 1468 the same payment is made "ex gracia regis;"[2] and in 1469, the last year in this volume, it is again made, under a new grant to be good till the King's majority.[3] Did these entries stand alone, the almost inevitable inference would be that the Countess meant was Margaret Douglas, the "Fair Maid of Galloway," widow of the seventh and eighth Earls of Douglas, for whom James II. had provided, first by an annuity, and then by giving her in marriage to his half brother; and that she had in or before 1465 been divorced from the Earl of Athole, (who survived till 1512), and re-married to a Lindsay. Evidence, however, exists outside this volume, which upsets this hypothetical identity by proving that the lady here called Margaret really bore the name of Janet.

On 13th October 1472 James III. granted to Janet Countess of Douglas a charter for her life of the already mentioned Petpullokis and Pettintoscale, in satisfaction of her terce as widow of William Earl of Douglas, a grant renewed to her under exactly the same designation on 22nd January 1472–3. Dempster of Auchterless (who,[4] as local Chamberlain, renders the Brechin accounts in the present volume) became involved, in consequence of a lease of Pettintoscale which he had from the Crown, in a dispute before the Lords Auditors with "Jahne" Countess of Douglas, the records of which, of date 1474 and 1476, are extant.[1] Turning to the Exchequer accounts beyond the date of this volume, those of 1470 and 1472 are wanting. The Brechin account of 1471 contains the same payment "Margarete Lindesay comitisse de Douglas." In consequence of James III. having bestowed Brechin on 9th March 1472–3 on David fifth Earl of Crawford for life,[2] we have no Brechin accounts for a few years. But the gift was probably struck at by the revocation made by the King on attaining the age of twenty-five: and the accounts of Brechin begin again in 1477, when "Margareta Lyndesay olim comitissa de Douglas" once more receives the fermes of the same lands for the term of Whitsunday 1476, an entry precluding the idea that a Countess Jane had at the date of the plea alluded to, succeeded a Countess Margaret in the possession of Pettintoscale. The adverb "olim," however, does not denote that this lady was dead. She appears as Janet Countess of Douglas in the Kincardine account of the same audit; and in the contemporary Fife account begins a series of payments to her "in recompensam tercie sue," from the lands of Luthry and Rathillet, in virtue of a grant to her for life under the Great Seal, generally as Janet Lindsay Countess of Douglas, though in one instance (in 1478) the old blunder recurs, and she is called Margaret. Her name occurs as usual in the account of 1482. The accounts of the Ballivi ad extra for 1483 are wanting, and in the Fife account of 1484 she is no longer to be found, and, it may be presumed, was dead.

Who was this Countess of Douglas? In her charters of Pettintoscale she is called widow of William Earl of Douglas. But this could not be William eighth Earl, who was stabbed by James II. in Stirling Castle on February 22d, 1451–2; inasmuch as that Earl, on July 24th, 1444,[1]—almost immediately after his succession,—obtained a dispensation to marry his cousin Margaret Douglas, the "Fair Maid of Galloway," had a grant of the marriage of the same lady on 2d February 1449–50,[2] and only seven months before his death,—on 7th July 1451,—had a crown charter of Bothwell to himself and Margaret his wife,[3] dates which preclude the possibility of his having had another Countess either before or after Margaret. The Earl William meant must therefore have been William sixth Earl of Douglas, who, young as he was when beheaded in Edinburgh Castle in 1440, had yet attained a marriageable age; and the Exchequer Rolls further inform us that his wife was a Lindsay.

Boece, in a passage which has been adopted verbatim by Pitscottie and in substance by Hume of Godscroft, affirms that the mother of this Earl William was a daughter of the Earl of Crawford, whose marriage to Archibald fifth Earl of Douglas had been solemnized at Dundee with an unheard-of pomp and magnificence.[1] Later genealogists, aware that the mother of the sixth Earl of Douglas was in reality Euphemia Graham, daughter of Patrick Earl of Strathern, who in her widowhood re-married James Lord Hamilton, but assuming that there must have been some foundation for Boece's circumstantial story, have assigned to Earl Archibald as his first wife, though not mother of his family, a daughter of the first Earl of Crawford. But the Great Seal Register contains evidence that Earl Archibald must have been married to Euphemia Graham before he succeeded to the earldom;[2] and, apart from Boece's admittedly incorrect narrative, there is no trace of his having any other wife. If, on the other hand, we suppose the foundation of Boece's assertion to have been a marriage, not of Earl Archibald but of his son Earl William, celebrated with an ostentation in keeping with the character of the latter, the lady being a daughter not of the first but of the second Earl of Crawford, the genealogical puzzle disappears, and at the same time the surname of Lindsay in the Brechin and Fife accounts is satisfactorily explained.
